Area-studies programs typically draw on disciplines such as political science, history, sociology, ethnology, geography, linguistics, literature, and cultural studies. Today's area studies can be seen as having their origins in the colonial expansion of European powers during the 18th century and the accompanying academic efforts to better understand the languages, cultures, and social organizations of colonized peoples. In that sense, area studies emerged as a "child of empire," often ...

Area studies | social research | Britannica
It is suggested that there have been four stages in the development of relationships between area studies and the social sciences; that is to say—naming the extremes—between the gathering of data and its ordering by theoretical constructs. In the first stage, data about foreign areas were collected through field research by area specialists. A second stage saw the comparison of similar problems in different areas through the broadening of training of area specialists. In the third stage ...

Another critical contribution of the social sciences to area studies is the growing collection of common social mechanisms and processes that political scientists, sociologists, and economists have studied in detail. Social scientists aren't able to provide comprehensive theories of society that can simply be "applied" to specific areas; there is no general theory of the state that would permit the Middle East specialist to understand and predict the behavior of the Syrian regime. But social ...
